Abstract: The fact of being disabled can be a special factor making the processing of adolescent life crisis even more difficult. The uneasy conduct of life, the lack of confidence in the future and the increased level of frustration can all disturb the formation of the adult view of oneself. People living with any kind of disability need special mental health support at every phase of their life. The methods and forms of this can also be determined by the level of deficiency. The aim of this study is to draw attention to this special problem. The study reports the results of a survey performed on disabled, adolescent people, where the main goal was to detect the development of personality and at the same time analysing the applicability of tests already in use in the affected group
